Pracademic Fellowship Program

Open to mid-career faculty in political science and related fields

Over the past several decades, there have been limited opportunities for faculty members in public management, public policy, and related fields to move between the academy and the world of practitioners. The Pracademic Fellowship Program aims to address this gap by supporting mid-career faculty members to work in federal government agencies in the Washington, D.C. area. Pracademic fellows work directly with decision-makers involved in programs of their interest and get a first-hand vantage point of a federal agency's decision-making environment. Participation in the Pracademic Fellowship Program enables faculty members to bring an enhanced understanding of real-world management challenges to their research and classroom.

Who is the Pracademic Fellowship Program for?

The program is open to faculty in political science, public management, public policy, public administration, and related fields who are interested in engaging with the world of practitioners. In the past, fellowship residencies have overlapped with faculty sabbatical opportunities, making the program particularly well-suited to mid-career faculty.

How are fellows placed?

The Pracademic Fellowship Committee works with fellows to secure placement in an agency of interest to them. To learn more about this process, please visit our website.

How long is a Pracademic Fellow's residence?

The Pracademic Fellowship Program has a flexible start date and duration. Typical fellowships last between one semester and one year.

Is support available?

Fellows are eligible for a stipend designed to supplement sabbatical support. They may also seek support from sponsoring institutions.
